Dear Ms. Sassower:

I'm afraid that the fact that Brill's Content rejected a story idea does not strike me as a terribly compelling story. While editors ideally should respond to queries promptly, and return materials when asked, I don't think the fact that Brill's editor may not have done so would be of particular interest to our readers.

Frankly, I myself probably would not have been interested in a story about why the New York Times does not have an ombudsman. While I deeply respect Ben Bagdikian, in my experience most ombudsmen are more of a problem than a solution.

Thanks for your interest.
