WPCNR LEGACIES OF WHITE PLAINS. From Center for Judicial Accountability. December 7, 2006: Doris L. Sassower, of White Plains, NY, a leading feminist lawyer who, at 35, was the youngest President of the New York Women's Bar Association, is profiled in the just-published book, Feminists Who Changed America, 1963-1975. "The women's movement was, apart from the civil rights upheaval, the major social revolution of the 20th century," says Sassower.

The book, edited by Barbara J. Love, was released on November 13. Publication was celebrated with an all-day gala event at Columbia University and Barnard College in NYC, sponsored by the Veteran Feminists of America. The program included a symposium on the women's movement at Columbia Faculty House, followed by a reception hosted by Barnard President, Dr. Judith Shapiro, and dinner honoring Sassower and feminists such as Gloria Steinem.

Sassower battled her own profession for years, and galvanized bar leaders into action that won greater equality between the sexes in and outside the legal profession. In 1993, she co-founded the Center for Judicial Accountability, Inc., a national, nonpartisan, nonprofit organization, based in White Plains, NY, which she describes as "documenting the corruption of our federal, state, and local judicial nominating processes for appointment, as well as for election, and of all remedies for redress of judicial abuse and other misconduct." Her articles, speeches, and legal cases challenging sexism, as well as other papers, are archived at the Schlesinger Library of Harvard University.

Sassower, Doris L. (1932 -) It was her "second-class citizen" experience at NYU Law School as one of six women in the 1955 class that turned Sassower into a future leader of the women's movement. By 1968, at age 35, Sassower was elected president of the New York Women's Bar Association. Her 1968 Trial Magazine article, "What's Wrong with Women Lawyers?" concluded that nothing whatever was wrong with women lawvers but the discrimination against them in the legal profession, reflecting the societal sexism of the time. In February 1969, Sassower presented these "radical" views to the National Conference of Bar Presidents, the first woman ever invited to do so. In that same year, four years prior to the U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Roe v. Wade, Sassower led the New York Women's Bar Association to become the first bar association to endorse repeal of New York's abortion law. In April 1970, Sassower co-convened a national conference on Breaking Down the Barriers in the Professions. More than 500 professional and academic women from across the country and abroad listened to documented reports on the unequal status of women in America. This, she says, led to the formation of the Professional Women's Caucus, the first respected professional support for what became known as the women's movement. In 1971, as head of PWC's legal arm, Sassower filed a class action complaint against every American law school receiving federal funds, based on their identified discrimination against women. Sassower brought a test case under NYC's human rights law and made new law for women by expanding city and state jurisdiction to include financial institutions and credit houses under the rubric "public accommodations." In 1972, she became the first woman practitioner nominated at a judicial convention for the New York Court of Appeals. She also became the first woman named to the New York State Bar Association's judiciary committee, serving for eight years. Sassower's advocacy skills transformed the world for women and men, particularly in family law. By the early 1970s, she had become known as "the mother of joint custody," also arguing-well before the U.S. Supreme Court so ruled that statutory denial of alimony to men was unconstitutional sex-stereotyping. In 1977, Harvard Law School hung her portrait as part of its 25th anniversary celebration of its admission of women. Her pioneering efforts have been recognized nationally. In 1981, NY State NOW honored her with a Special Award for "outstanding achievements on behalf of women and children in the area of family law." Since her retirement from law practice, Sassower has worked, pro bono, as co-founder and director of the Center for Judicial Accountability, Inc. In 1997, she won a national Giraffe Award, given to those who "stick their necks out for the Common Good." In addition to her J.D. from NYU Law School (1955), Sassower holds a BA from Brooklyn College (1954). She has three children. Archives: Schlesinger Library, Radcliffe Institute, Cambridge, MA. (ABS)
